Foster Care Agency Reorganization Drives Mental Health Dialogue

Eric Woomer, Federation of Texas Psychiatry Public Policy Consultant

As usual, there continues to be significant activity surrounding mental health issues at the Texas Legislature. Here is a brief list of noteworthy topics that the Federation of Texas Psychiatry is tracking on behalf of the state's psychiatrists.

Last December, a federal judge found Texas' long-term foster care system unconstitutional and ordered a series of reforms. In March, two special masters were appointed to oversee the state's progress in implementing ordered changes. Also in March, the Department of Family & Protective Services Commissioner John Specia announced he would retire from the agency on May 31.

Specia, who has led the agency since late 2012, is a former family law judge and attorney who worked in cases related to foster care. In April, Gov. Greg Abbott appointed Hank Whitman, a former chief of the Texas Rangers, a state law enforcement agency, to replace Specia as the DFPS's new commissioner. The move suggests that Gov. Abbott sees a greater role for a law-enforcement perspective in managing the Texas foster care system and the other functions of DFPS.

News outlets reported that Texas foster care youth stayed an extra 768 days in psychiatric facilities partly because of the state's lack of placement homes for children. In 2009, the number of extra days spent was 10. A lack of capacity is "part of the problem," said a TxDFPS spokeswoman, saying that a child having mental health issues may go "into a psychiatric hospital and gets the help the child needs and it's time for the child to be released, and then we have no placement to place that child. The bottom line is we need more foster homes."

DFPS also issued the 2016 iteration of Psychotropic Medication Utilization Parameters for Children and Youth in Foster Care. These parameters are designed to provide physicians with the simplicity and flexibility needed in the pre-authorization approval process for treating young people in foster care with psychiatric issues.

A chart prepared by DFPS demonstrated continued declines in the percentage of children in Texas foster care taking psychotropic medications for more than 60 days, class polypharmacy or taking five or more medications. Since 2004, these categories have seen reductions of 48%, 74% and 74%, respectively.

In April, members of the Texas Health and Human Services Transition Oversight Committee met to hear invited testimony and monitor progress of the state's health agency overhaul, approved by the Legislature in 2015. Key lawmakers pushed back on agency reorganization plans proposed by HHSC Commissioner Chris Traylor. Particularly, legislators were concerned about a potential division between Medicaid/CHIP eligibility and community services and the need for an integrated, one-stop entry point for clients.

Members of the Federation expressed apprehension about the proposed organizational charts that separates in-patient & community-based mental health services into separate silos, as well as had undefined roles for the medical directors of the various health care entities. HHSC was asked by lawmakers to return to the drawing board to modify their proposals.

Just recently, the Center for Medicaid and Medicare Services issued a new rule to promote parity in mental health services for Medicaid and CHIP recipients. The new standard requires states and plans ensure recipients have access to the same mental health and substance use disorder benefit and protections as private plans no later than 18 months after March 30th, 2016. The new coverage directive is expected to cost $1 billion in federal and state funds and serve $23 million Medicaid beneficiaries and 880,000 children receiving CHIP services.

In March, a new law signed by New Mexico Governor Susana Martinez is meant to provide greater liability protection for Texas doctors treating New Mexico patients. The law assures Texas doctors they will be able to protect themselves through insurance from potential lawsuits from New Mexico patients. Recent litigation had undermined that certainty.

The House Select Committee on Mental Health continues to hold periodic hearings covering a full range of mental health issues. State mental health investment is a challenge to review because it is so broad, covering more than a dozen policy areas (including education, workforce, insurance, public health and criminal justice) and billions in state dollars.

According to Chairman Four Price, the Committee's challenge is to think about not only what's being spent, but also how to spend that money better, and what metrics might be used to signify quality. The priority issues the Committee is considering include workforce shortfalls and access issues, insurance parity, treatment of the veteran and homeless populations, and how the Texas public school systems recognize and address mental health issues.

Dr. Bill Streusand testified before the Select Committee in March about mental healthcare access, observing that with "eight thousand child psychiatrists but 15 million children who need us - the math will never work out." Dr. Streusand discussed the difficulties in treating mental illness outside of an integrated care setting because mental health was intrinsically related to physical health and development, adding, "it's like a symphony orchestra is substituting different instruments and different players while performing at the same time - that's how complex the brain is."

Discussing his frustration with insurance companies and bureaucratic red tape as the main reasons he stopped taking private insurance, Dr. Streusand said that "wrestling with an insurance company for compensation" was a waste of time that could be spent on treatment and also avoided compelled prescriptions as well as treatment schedules which may not meet patient needs.

In 2016, changes to gun statutes have diminished the ability for state mental health hospitals to prohibit guns on their premises. The Federation has engaged more than a dozen key lawmakers and stakeholders, including statewide legislative leadership and gun rights advocates, to find a method to restore the ability of state hospitals to prohibit gun possession in restricted areas through signage and other means. Those discussions have been largely positive, and the Federation is committed to working with interested parties to pass needed legislation in 2017.
